James Easter House
Baltimore County, Maryland

Narrative Description

James Easter House, 408 Pleasant Hill Road - (Contributing Resource Count: 6: house, water tower, greenhouse, dairy house, cottage, garage). This balloon frame house has an irregular, massed plan with cross gables and side gable. It has two-and-one-half stories with four bays, and is covered with original lapped horizontal and shingle siding. Stylistic influences include Queen Anne with Gothic Revival and Shingle style detailing. Decorative features include a column-supported wrap-around porch with standing seam metal roof and turned balustrade, two story bay windows, pedimented gable dormers and round-arched windows. A section of the rear porch appears to have been enclosed, creating a one room addition. Outbuildings which remain on the property include a late nineteenth century, frame water tower; a green house; a circular, stone outbuilding with dairy/icehouse; an early twentieth century, shingle-sided, frame garage; and a shingle-sided dog house on a raised concrete foundation (non-contributing).

The upper stories of the house are sheathed with wood shingles; the ground floor has lapped wood siding. Light-colored slate shingles cover both roof as well as the dormer sides. There are a variety of window types including bay windows, ribbon windows on the living/sitting rooms flanked with decorative patterned panes, and simple 2/2 sash windows with louvered shutters. A handsome wood porch with turned posts and straight balusters wraps the front (east) and side (north) of the house. Several entry doors, some with transom lights, are accessed from the porch.

The main house is in fair to good condition. Its architectural integrity is excellent; its form and details have seen little, if any changes since it was built. The house has a rambling feeling reminiscent of late nineteenth century summer resorts such as in Mackinac Island, Michigan. This is emphasized by the array of surface treatments and gable ends, dormers, the gracious wrap-around porch, and the overall irregular, open plan. The house's airy, spacious feeling is enhanced by a balcony on the west side second floor, and bay window projections and dormers add visual interest to the exterior.

The greenhouse is in fair condition, with glass panes on the sides and ends with a clearstory on the roof. The clearstory could apparently be opened and closed by means of a wheel-driven pulley mechanism which is still extant. There are raised concrete beds throughout the greenhouse, around the walls and in the center. They still contain soil but do not appear to be in use today. The modest size of this structure suggests that it was for family rather than commercial use.

Behind the greenhouse is a frame, single pile, single room, one story cottage. A brick chimney pierces the gable roof. The cottage has a single-leaf door and 6/6 light, double-hung sash windows. It is presently used as a workshop/storage area.

The water tower is square and constructed of wood with overlapping siding. An octagonal hipped roof has overhanging eaves with decorative wood brackets. A small door and platform is present on the north side. The wood superstructure is on top of a smaller, square, semi-subterranean stone building which probably served as a spring house. It is still in good condition and is accessed by a small wood door.

The garage is a large, three-bay frame building with overhanging gable roof and wood shingles on the gable end. It has sash windows and entry door on the side, and the inside has been used for a workshop. It is of early 20th century construction, but is a contributing structure.

James Easter House

Behind the main house is a small, plastered, subterranean dairy or icehouse with superstructure which is circular in shape with a hexagonal hip roof and a small spire. The upper portion may have been used for curing meats, as suggested by the large hooks that pierce the roof beams. A three-bay open storage shed is attached to the building.

Narrative Statement of Significance

The James Easter House sits on a tract of land purchased by James Miller Easter from Hugh McVeigh on September 23, 1892. McVeigh had owned the parcel since he bought it from E.L. Geary on June 24, 1884. James Easter is said to have occupied the property since 1895, and to have been in residence as late as 1978. Informant descriptions state that Easter enlarged the house, which implies that it was constructed by one of the previous property owners (Landmarks Commission Files); however, this information requires verification.

The principal barn has been destroyed, but the main house and other outbuildings as described above remain intact in fair to good condition. All should be considered contributing resources with the exception of the doghouse. The house and its site, including its principal outbuildings, retain their historic character and integrity. The alteration of the rear elevation as a result of the partial enclosure of the porch does not compromise the historic character of the structure.

The James Easter House is a significant example of a late nineteenth century Victorian residence incorporating elements of the Queen Anne, Gothic Revival and Shingle styles. The combination of style types embody many aspects of the Romantic movement in architecture. The house is the antithesis of the classic, symmetrical and restrained modes with its open, irregular plan, complex layout, alternating shapes and projections. This structure's eclectic and interesting combination of nineteenth century style types and its good architectural integrity make it a rare resource in Baltimore County. The James Easter House is an excellent local example of an elaborate Victorian residence representing several popular national styles. It retains integrity of location, design, setting, materials, workmanship, feeling and association. The house, surrounding estate property and outbuildings are potentially eligible for listing on the National Register under criterion C because they embody the "distinctive characteristics of a type, period or method of construction."
